For immediate release... Neurodiversity Press is pleased to announce the publication of Terri Duncan's brilliant, and ground-breaking new book, "Why Emotional Regulation Might Mean...EVERYTHING." The book puts forth the idea that when we are dysregulated—emotionally or physically—that we can rarely learn, or often even listen. The book successfully argues that the skill of how to process life when life doesn't go your way is a foundational starting point for neurodiverse children whose importance may outweigh all other learning strategies.

With a Foreword by Dr. Barry Prizant, author of the acclaimed, gold standard book on autism, "Uniquely Human: A Different Way of Seeing Autism," Duncan's book not only cites multiple arenas in our lives where emotional regulation consciously and unconsciously impacts us, but makes sure to list dozens and dozens of helpful hints, and strategies for success. It should be noted that thanks to the further dysregulation of COVID, partisanship, social media, culture wars, remote learning...that we ALL may be in a place where we need this book.

Terri Duncan, MSLP, R.SLP, S-LP (C) is the founder and Executive Director of Children's Autism Services of Edmonton. She is a speech language pathologist and has worked with children with autism and a broad range of developmental delays for more than 20 years. Her book's testimonial quotes by the great Temple Grandin, and so many others, show how respected Duncan is in the autism and neurodiversity fields. Terri started Children's Autism Services of Edmonton in 2004 and since that time, the organization has grown to be the largest service provider in Western Canada, if not also one of the most respected in the world.

The book comes in at 212 pages and will be available November 1, 2024 on the Neurodiversity Press website (www.neurodiversitypress.com), or on Amazon.com at a cost of US $26.00 plus tax and shipping, or US $12.00 plus tax for the pdf Ebook.
